Veera Korkeamäki

Hello, I'm Veera Finnish first year student in LAB University studying Industrial Information Technology.

As seen on my CV, my work experience is nothing notable. For a long time it was nothing but extra busy work to fill between my studies in teens and early 20s. But after 2017 right before finishing my Media Assistant degree I suffered from a burnout. It was discovered that the cause was mostly undiagnosed depression and autism disorder. Certainly both were blows to my sense of self and self esteem at the time, but today getting diagnosis for both has helped me become more secure and confident person.

But even if my current self was positively affected by all that in the long term, it did take me two years to regain my footing as a contributing member of society and attempt to join the work force. Which was right at February 2020. Three years later after attempting to join workforce with my existing arts decrees I realized the field was simply not for me. Field being too competitive, anxiety inducing and hectic for my psyche. I decided that it would be best to look for another field of employment. And today, I study as at LAB University.

I have always been interested in coding in general. The first time I applied for studied in technology sector I thought coding, building things and learning how it all worked would have been more central to the studies. However the teachers, classmates and the level of vocation school education on the field was so distressing to my back then self, and killed any interest I had for the field, for close to a decade. However after trying to learn C and C# seriously for the nth time; I thought I might as well learn properly in school enviroment. Since clearly self studies were not leading me too far and I was very much still interested in learning the ins and outs of how computer and other software worked regardless of my personal claims to opposite.

I can never tell what kind of person I am. It is harder for me to look inward, than see the world around me and point at things I enjoy and want. Very possibly due to my autism, but also, people do be very blind to their own weaknesses in general. So:

I want to learn more, I want to better myself, I want to understand. I might not be fastest or the smartest in any given room, but I am curious. Making me a great fit for information technology in that regard. Sometimes I can also be very stubborn and hit my head at the problem too long without seeking help, this I can recodnize as a personal weakness. The problem is though, when I succeed in solving the given problem on my own. It makes me feel as if I've learned something and brings me so much joy realizing I've succeeded in something. I also have either a good or bad sense of humour. I don't know which one, all I know is I find dad jokes funny and will sometimes giggle until I can't breathe. I also take compliments very badly and will assume you are lying about those unless there is quantifyable evidence to contrarary.

Another curiosity about me I want to highlight is my love of arts. High arts, low arts, experimental, indie, mainstream, video games, music, illustrations. I love and enjoy them. And someday I wish to make my own piece of SOMETHING that people will find joy and inspiration in. It doesn't need to be anything grand, just something people see and feel things about. But for now, I dabble in writing, painting and sculpting silly little things only for myself.

My plans for the future are not that grand. A stable job, internalize as much knowledge in school as possible, and move on from this place of ennui I have been stuck in for years. However the future is so misty for me, that I can not tell how to specialize or where to look for this future yet. I just don't want to be a burder anymore.
